

A Mistaken Caller. A charming young lady of North Meridian street of a decided literary turn of mind frequently indulges in the purchase of a new book. Her library has some very choice works, and nothing pleases her more than a valuable and handsome addition to the collection. She buys whenever she can, and one of her latest purchases is a very fine edition of a great work. It is richly illustrated, and, altogether, is something to be proud of. One morning last week the bell rang and the maid went up stairs and informed the young lady that a man was at the door to see her. Now, she had bought the book, which is delivered each month, and the payment is made each time. The young lady thought the man must be the one with the book, so she ran down quickly with her pocketbook in her hand. When the maid left the man at the door she was a wise maid and she calmly bolted the screen on the inside, while she went to call the y. l. What was the consternation of the young lady when she saw one of the best-known beaux of the city, and one of her best friends, on the outside of the screen, and she appearing with her pocket-book. The family still hold it over her as a little joke, and ask her how much she has to pay the young men to call.

Reflections.

There is no disputing the fact that men are just as much given to scanning themselves in the glass as women are. The old-fashioned idea that the contrary is true is exploded. There is rarely a day when men may not be seen standing in front of the stores where there are mirrors, and, of course, it is perfectly plain that they are looking at themselves in the glass, for they are usually adjusting some portion of the outfit. Perhaps the hat or collar is a little awry, or the necktle is not quite straight. The movement to fix the part in disorder is often very slight, but there is no mistaking it. It is quite the fashion to have mirrors in the store windows, for they reflect the articles therein and add to the general good effect. The store windows with mirrors are not the only places where one may behold himself, for there are dozens and dozens of places where there are no mirrors and yet places where there are no mirrors, and yet the reflections are almost as perfect as if there was a coat of quicksilver at the back. The new Public Library is a great place to see one's self. The large basement windows are almost high enough to show the whole are almost high enough to show the whole figure. For women who want to see just how their skirts hang it cannot be surpassed. Store windows where there are black or dark goods displayed are good for the purpose, and the men, women and children have discovered them. When a person passes a window and looks in attentively it is no sign that the goods are being admired or criticised. No, indeed; it is more than likely that the contents of the window have not been seen. It is wonderful that while there are thousands and thousands of things that are more attractive to look upon that mankind will spend more time looking at himself than at anything else. The little touches here and there, the straightening of a bow or curl, and the air which the persons so rearranging themselves put on, as if they were doing it unconsciously and had not viewed themselves in the glass, is amusing, even if the person seeing it would not ing, even if the person seeing it would not walk right off and do the selfsame thing within a block or two. Reflections on self are not so bad as reflections on a neighbor.

Cowan, formerly of Indianapolis, were married by the Rev. Dr. W. C. Young, of Danville. The wedding was a very quiet one, only the intimate friends and relatives being present, and, except the decorations of palms and American Beauty roses, no display was attempted. As the bride and groom and their attendants took their places, the orchestra played Mendelssohn's wedding march. The bride wore an elegant gown of white silk and a veil, and carried a large bouquet of white roses, and the bridesmaids, with the exception of the maid of honor, who wore blue, were gowned in simple white costumes. Miss Emma Belle Moore was the maid of honor, and Mr. Charles Woodruff, of Chicago, the best man. The bridesmaids were Misses Margaret Muldoon, Nina McGoodwin, Anabel Lee and Mibel Green, and the ushers Messrs. Gilbert Cowan and Wilson Cochran. After the ceremony a reception was held at the residence, after which Mr. and Mrs. Cowan left for a trip North. They will return in about two weeks and Mr. and Mrs. Cowan left for a trip North. Louisville Courier-Journal.

The initial meeting of the Katherine Merrill Club for the season was held yesterday, and the President's day was observed with a 3-o'clock lincheon, given at the residence of Miss May Shipp, on North Delaware street. The members and guests were seated at tables, those having toasts being divided and placed at the two larger tables and the others being seated at nine small tables. The rooms were decorated with fall flowers and the tables with carnations and roses. At each cover were cards bearing the name of the member and a small card of parchment, which, in illuminated letters, had the three courses and a subject for table talk after each. The cards were very pretty, and the illuminating was the work of Mrs. J. L. Griffiths. After "Fish" the subject was, "Has the Public a Taste of Its Own?" after "Salad," "The Salt of the Earth," and after "Dessert," "A Second Choice of a Nationality." At the large table was Mrs. Grace Julian Clark, the retiring president, who responded to the toast, "Our Club," and the new president, Mrs. Henry Coburn, who responded to "The Ideal Club." The other subjects were: "Who Is the Representative Woman?" by Mrs. John M. Judah, of Memphis; "Woman in Municipal Government," by Miss Harriet Noble, and "A Talker for Victory," by Mrs. J. L. Ketcham. Mrs. Judah, who lives in Memphis, still retains her active membership in the club.
